The man. It is fitting now to recall the significance of that extraordinary educational development which he initiated and guided in America. When, in 1875, he accepted the presidency of the new Johns Hepkins University the institution was all to make, and fortunately President Gilman was given a free hand. The founder (advantage not enjoyed by all organizers) was dead and subject of beatification rather than of negotiation. The trustees trusted | throat with her husband's razor. She was their man implicitly, and he proved worthy of their confidence. He gave the new university an ideal of exact scholarship and a working plan of original research. It an adjoining room. was a new idea in American education. Individual scholars, like Whitney at Yale and Child at Harvard, had managed to find occasional students fit for discipleship, but their efforts were isolated and almost without honor in their own colleges. At Harvard President Eliot undoubtedly held already the ideals which he has since splendidly realized, but his was the task of superimposing a university on a college old-style-a condition which made his work one of infinite pains and compromises and required much time; whereas President Gilman started de novo, with what appeared to be then abundant funds. Where other men would have built handsome buildings he sent North and South and across the water for a few great scholars, and set them to teaching in such quarters as lay nearest to hand. Early Hopkinsians, if not "evil-entreated, studied almost "in caves and the holes of the earth," and, in fact, it is only of recent years that the university has been decently housed; but in each of these shabby rooms were the necessary books and a great specialist with his disciples and coworkers. He proved, as the Nation said at the time, that the body of instructors was the real thing, and that you might have a university, "and a pretty good one, under a tent, with a library of 500 volumes kept in soap boxes." You might have hunted over America in vain in the late seventies to find another such institution, and nothing has been more gratifying than the generous way in which the great universities which subsequently carried out President Gilman's idea, and carried it further than he, with small and shrinking resources, could do, have acknowledged his leadership in shaping the American university ideal. It was largely his work, in its direct and indirect effects, that gave American scholarship its citizen's rights in the academic world at large. Some such reflections the news of his rehigher education in America. President Gilman resigns ostensibly in obedience to the unwritten law that threescore-and-ten are the years of an administrator. At Johns Hopkins University they would face gladly the "and if they be fourscore;" but those who know the present status of the university know, too, that the problems of financial support demand not only the sheer force, but the long future, of a younger man. President Gilman could carry away no greater honors than those he has already won. It remains for a new leader to keep intact the old ideal and raily to its material support the local and national aid that has been singularly withheld from so deserving an institution.

We certainly must not be deceived by any friendly utterances attributed to Li Hung Chang, as not only he, but the ministers representing the government of China at the foreign capitals, and who are being freely quoted, are perfectly well aware that, whatever may be the desire or purpose of the Emperor of China, neither he nor his government can do anything towards restoring permanent conditions looking to peace or the rights of foreigners without the actual presence and support of the civilized nations acting unitedly. The failure of the United States to join in this concert could only result in a dismemberment of the Chinese empire and the closing of the 'open door.'
